MAJOR OVERVIEW

In a world where media and communication are central to relationships, professions, and global issues, the Communication and Media Studies major equips students with the theoretical knowledge and practical skills to analyze, create, and engage effectively with people and media. The interdisciplinary curriculum explores media forms, practices, technologies, and industries; research in communication and media, with a focus on emerging and social media; media uses and effects at individual, relational, cultural, and societal levels; and the relationship between media, communication, and global processes.

The program prepares students for diverse careers in fields including communication management, public relations, journalism, human resources, education, technology, hospitality, and tourism, while also providing a strong foundation for graduate study in related disciplines.
